“ It's been a week now and I'm just realizing that there is a place to leave a message.

I'm glad I got to spend time with her. I spent the first part of my life living next door and she was a great grandmother- always welcoming and willing to share treats. She had a big hand in a few Mardi Gras costumes back then and was always encouraging of whatever creative endeavors I'd get up to.

As a young man I drew away from just about everyone. When I decided that I was ready to reach out and be a family member again she never said boo about my missing years- just happily answered the phone and it was like the time never passed. She was funny and sweet and honest in ways that were sometimes surprising to me at first, but over time it became clear that this wasn't a put-on. That's just who she was.

The last couple weeks have been full of introspection. I can't say that I knew her any better than any of the several people that she was on the phone with regularly up to the end, but I can say what she was to me.

She was always interested in expressing herself through visual arts and the written word.

She had a curiosity toward and enjoyment of technology.

While not externally full of woo mysticism, she was always game for talk about UFO sightings and intense spiritual matters.

She maintained a relentlessly positive attitude, no matter what life threw her way.

Cindilu, you've been a joy to know and an inspiration in life. None of us knows how long we'll live, but when I get to the end I hope I've got half as many friends to talk to as you did. I love you and look forward to seeing you again some day.
